35 YEARS A JOCKEY.

The life of a professional jockey i full of the wildest and most unrestrained excitement. I doubt if its parallel can be found in any other vocation. Watch even the casual spectator of a horse race, as he sits on the grand stand calmly viewing the start, and then see him as the horses speed around the track. The on-looker becomes interested more and more until. by the time the winner has crossed the line, he is standing in his chair, madly waving his arms and cheering until his breath is gone. That is the way a closely contested race affects even a passive spectator. To what feverish excitement, then, is the jockey himself subjected who, next to the good mount unnder his saddle, is the simply taking a "constitutional" morning canter on his father's favor-
